We hate to be the ones who break the news, but here it is: Not everything you see on reality TV is real. In fact, most of what the sees in the version of any program is very edited to make it look a certain way. However, this is not necessarily a bad thing. Reality shows would be very boring without a little dramatic embellishment. Imagine an episode of House Hunters where there are only two people sitting there waiting for the results of a home inspection. That wouldn't be fun at all! One of HGTV's most intriguing shows is My Lottery Dream Home, a reality show where real-life lottery winners look for prettier homes to better suit their new financial status in life. But fans of the show can't help but wonder, is that all that's false? David Bromstad? Dave Kotinsky/Getty Images Program participants are true lottery winners As for the most obvious aspect of My Lottery Dream Home, there is a fact fans can count on. All featured house hunters are true lottery winners. Not everyone may have made that much money—the profits range from a couple of million to hundreds of millions—but everyone has actually and really won a lottery. Host David Bromstad says that in the early days of the show, finding people to participate was the hardest part. How many people win the lottery? And how many people want to buy houses? And how many people want to be on TV, he said during an interview with The Wrap. It started so slow. It took a year for each of the first two episodes just to release. So, it was a lot of waiting -- 'Oooh, we got one! Oops, I'm sorry, we don't.' Now the show is much more popular, which makes it easier to find people who want to participate. You could look at houses that aren't for sale We've found out for years that house hunters are completely staged. Instead of looking for houses on camera, each show participant should be under contract in a house when they sign for the show. Two of the houses that travel during the segment are not true contenders. There could be a similar situation with My Lottery Dream Home. When David Bromstad visits houses with lottery winners, there is a good chance that some of the participants already know which house they want. Or you can show them options they'd never choose. In the first episode, they had asked for a limit of $3 million or less, and I showed them a house of $5 million. I don't normally do that, you know, they go millions above their limit, Bromstad explained to AOL. But when you make $180 million in the lottery, it comes with the territory. I pushed him a little there. Fans love the show no matter what's a little fake or not, fans are in love with My Lottery Dream Home, and David Bromstad's contagious and contagious enthusiasm is a big part of the reason. It keeps it real on the show and seems genuinely happy to be helping people their dream homes. One thing fans wish the show had? A follow-up series that documents what happens to all winners and their gorgeous new homes after the cameras stop rolling. We'll have to keep an eye on HGTV to see if they're following the advice! Council! Council!
